

BUILT TO SUCCEED

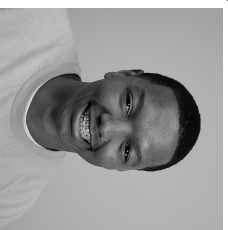

College isn't the only option, although they spend a lot of money and energy making it seem that way. An apprenticeship program is almost a fast track to a well paying career that won't cripple you with debt for 15+ years.

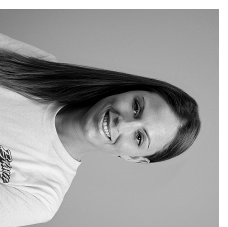

I would tell them to consider this trade because it really has a lot to offer and they treat you and your family very well.

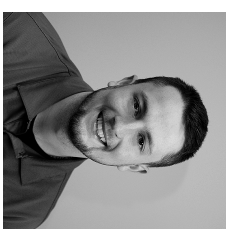

My family is all pro-union and I am a strong believer in the union. It is hard work, mentally and physically, but if I (a 5' tall girl) can do it anyone can if they have a good work ethic and the drive it takes to be successful.

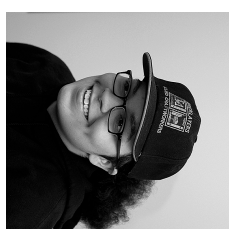

I feel like I made one of the best decisions of my life, though I am not done, it's just the beginning. I feel very confident and excited for the future.

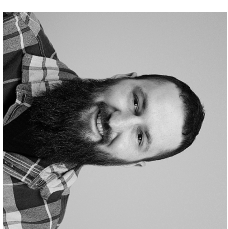

One of my friends who was an operator told me to apply because he said that females tend to be better operators.

An apprenticeship program is a great opportunity. It is basically free. And, you get paid while learning. After you are done, you will have earned a degree. It is a great, challenging career to get into.

My career path in the construction industry has matured me as a person. I realize that there is more to life.

I like the feeling of gratitude I get after I finish a job and seeing how that machine works and how important that machine is to our everyday life.

In the apprenticeship program, we get an education for free, learn to work with our hands and get trained while working a full time job.
